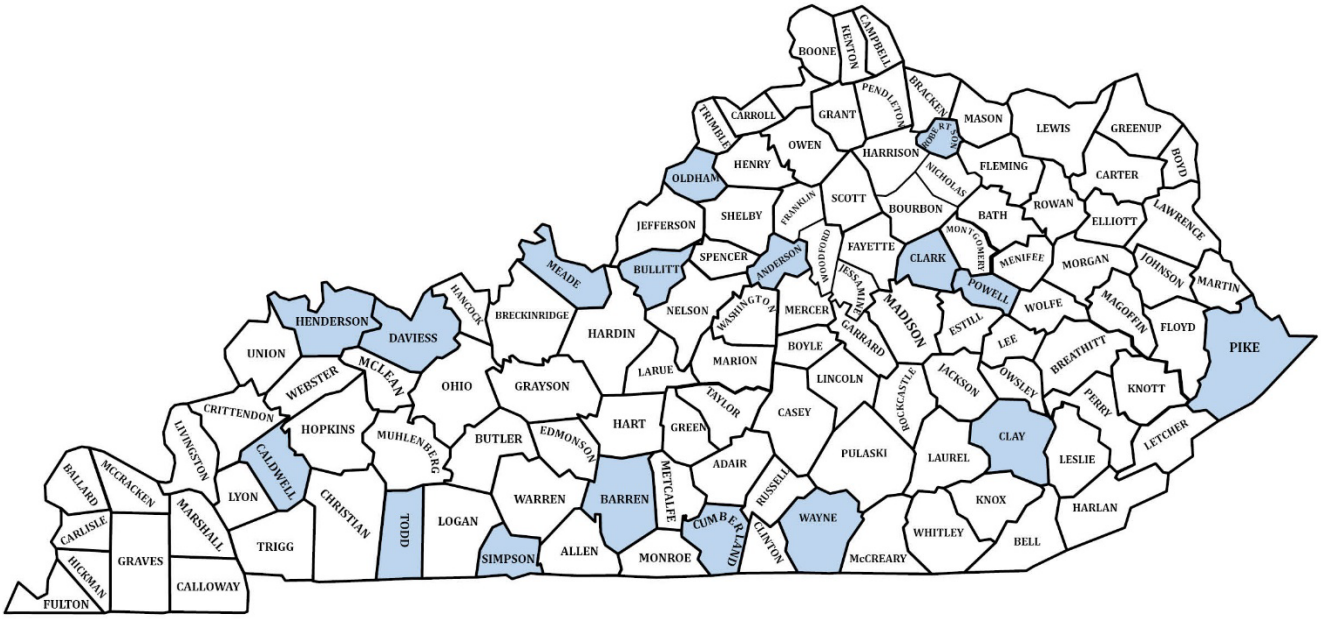
FY15 Report

Intrapersonal Leadership



Research shows that effective leadership is one factor necessary for success within today's communities and organizations. Extension's focus on helping clientele develop intrapersonal leadership skills is critical for use in a number of contexts. The Intrapersonal Leadership program is a part of the Kentucky Extension Leadership Development (KELD) curriculum that aims to provide Extension educators with research based leadership development resources. A total of 17 counties participated in the Intrapersonal Leadership program, with 716 individuals noting a positive change in their knowledge of leadership.

498 Number of individuals reporting that their skills as a leader improved

569 Number indicating an increase in their confidence as a leader

525 Number of individuals obtaining a better understanding of their own personality as a leader

52 Number of individuals indicating that they have mastered the art of influencing others (through meaningful communication, storytelling, etc.)

311 Number of those who developed a better understanding of effective teamwork

149 Number reporting newfound skills useful in managing conflict within personal interactions